SCHEDULING

Finish Projects Faster

tips and tricks for quicker job completion

By George Heddy

Several years ago, we were the general contractor on a 70,000-square-foot concrete 10-up office and manufacturing building for a major company. The project was interdependent, concrete, steelwork, and even on the jobsite, the job checker and when the tenant was expecting to move in. The two project team leaders weren't exactly sure what the exact move-in date was, not the contract completion date, nor what the GC required for a final inspection and certificate of occupancy, or what it took to get the utilities turned on. This was not a comforting thought, considering the project team was supposed to oversee the $5,000,000 project.

I organized team about the required building and fire department inspections, planning department landscape review, the electrical utility company's installation schedule for the transformer and meter, the phone line install date to allow us to perform the fire alarm testing, and the security system completion. I remember there were a lot of blank stares and no firm answers to finishing the project complete.

POST THE DATES
Our company builds this project type often and typically calculate the cost and project requirements based on a 7- to 8-month total completion schedule from groundbreaking to move in. Our contracts always specify the start and completion dates. In the first project meeting with our customers, these dates are confirmed and documented to avoid issues at the end of the project when people tend to forget what was said and completed eight months earlier.

I recommended the team post these critical dates in the minutes of every weekly customer meeting, and on the job office wall in bold letters for all to see. I suggest they post the start date, completion milestone legal dates (including foundations, slab, exterior walls, roof structure, high bearing, drywall framing, floor covering, final inspection, utilities, and punch list completion), and the final contract completion date. With these dates clearly posted and backed, the team will stay focused on the tasks required to complete the job on time.

A project team without a clear knowledge of the contract completion date or an understanding of what's required to make things happen is a disaster in procurement for a construction company. Finishing projects like many you've surely heard more than the budgeted cost for field labor, equipment, supervision, general conditions, temporary facilities, and utilities. In addition, your customer will be unhappy, and you likely end up in a dispute over delays and damages with your customer and subcontractors. And even more important, your customer will tell everyone that your company finished later than promised.

SPEND A LITTLE, MAKE A LOT
At our project meeting, I read about the project team leaders when they were planning on being or avoiding the building exterior concrete wall panels. Erecting 10-up wall panels is a critical path item when building multi-story buildings from the ground up. The team told me they had scheduled the 100-ton crane to erect panels in mid-December. I was thinking: Three more months. That seems like too long and isn't even enough time to finish the project and meet our contract completion date!

I asked them how they arrived at the mid-November lift date. They said they had all assumed it was reasonable, realistic, and reasonable. In order to be ready for the crane, I asked if they had checked the construction contract, schedule, or budget estimate to see if mid-November would work or if within the project goals or move-in date. They hadn't, and in fact, neither of them knew the contract completion date or the move-in requirements for the project. I was a little upset, to say the least.

Rather than fire them both on the spot, I decided to see if I could teach them to produce a better result for themselves, the company, and our customer. I asked if they could possibly move the date up a few weeks. They hesitated and shook their heads "no way" protest.

So, I encouraged them to think about how they could move the job a little faster. They had no idea.

I read ahead from both a $2,000 incentive bonus if they erected all the walls by October 31st. Guess what happened? They both changed their minds in a hour, agreed, promised, and guaranteed they could safely and would surely finish two weeks faster. Not a bad investment for me. A $4,000 investment versus our 15-man crew working for two weeks longer than expected ($40,000 revenue savings). The rest of the story is they lifted-up the walls on October 26th. I gave both the subcontractor and owner $2,000 each plus every owner $250 for their work efforts.

OFFER MORE TO GET MORE

What games, bonuses, and incentives can you offer to entice your crews to work faster and finish your bottom-line? Faster jobs equal more money in your pocket. To different incentives like competitions between crews, games to beat the budget, challenges to finish ahead of schedule, hardware store coupons for no defect or punch list items, catered barbeque jobite lunches for meeting milestones, dinner gift cards to crews who hit important targets, winter jackets for no jobsite accidents, or anything else that will keep work fun, exciting, entertaining, and competitive.

Take time to track your events how difficult it is to make a profit. Explain that these bottom-line bonuses make a big difference. Your job is to focus on positive factors you can use to influence your team to perform the best they can. Determine what fun and tasks you can to achieve your goals, post the schedule completion dates for all to see, and offer some incentives to beat the schedule. ■
